'The Life After' explores hope and love in purgatory

Questions of morality lie beneath romance

Brian Truitt
@briantruitt
USA TODAY

Finding love is tough, even in the afterlife.

In their Omni Press comic-book series The Life After, launching today, writer Joshua Hale Fialkov and artist Gabriel Bautista take readers on a coming-of-age journey through the purgatory of suicides and other after-death planes of existence.

All to a guy named Jude can catch Ms. Right.

"I'm obsessed with how every story we tell that matters is a romance," Fialkov says. "It was coming up with the most hopeless place you could put love, and purgatory was there."

Jude lives a very humdrum existence until, one day, he decides to finally approach a woman who's on his bus commute. This causes a glitch in the system that an enigmatic group of overseers has set up for the afterlife. Consequently, Jude watches this girl he's attracted to disappear, and he realizes he's in purgatory.

Watching her go, though, isn't heartbreak, it's motivation, Fialkov says. "The core is really the journey of this guy who wanted something, wanted someone so badly, that he broke every single restriction on himself to get to her, only to have her stolen away."

The afterlife is a strange place that offers a lot of artistic freedom, Bautista says. "The fact that this book takes place in an environment where all of time and space meets means I get to draw anything from a robot wearing a miniskirt to a man riding an elephant in a glass dome."

Along for the ride is an evil dog named Gertie and Ernest Hemingway — yes, that Ernest Hemingway — who becomes a sidekick and guide for Jude.

"Who else lived their life to the fullest at all times, and also committed suicide? Trust me, we looked. There is nobody else," Fialkov says. "There is no medication for him to live for eternity. All he has is to just roam and explore. It's who he was."

The story explores how morality is historically malleable. "Back in the day, killing yourself was something honorable," Fialkov says. "So just because culture has decided suicide is against the Bible doesn't mean suddenly all these people are being punished."

There are folks who jumped off bridges who are continually reliving that moment, but The Life After also is filled with honorable suicides, Bautista says. A French soldier who jumped on a grenade during the Battle of the Somme to save his countrymen would be there, he says, as would Thich Quang Duc, a monk who protested persecution of Buddhists by committing self-immolation.

The allegory of The Life After is not so much about religion as it is about real life, Fialkov says. "We live a life of polarized everything," he says. "We spend all this time at odds, but each of us has a journey we're on, and we're doing the best we can in the story we're telling of our lives. ... Life is people making mistakes, doing good things and bad things."

"The worst person in the world can do something nice one day."

'Earth to Echo' echoes a certain extraterrestrial tale

Bonds of friendship seal sci-fi adventure

Phone home: There's a new E.T. in town.

Earth to Echo is unlikely to become the heartwarming classic that 1982's E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial is, but the family-friendly sci-fi adventure has its own charms.

Every generation deserves its own visiting extraterrestrial. Overall, Earth to Echo is more of an homage to E.T. than a rip-off, despite the unoriginal promo poster that features a finger extended to a cute alien with a glowing light where his heart might be. Leading the trio is the engaging Tuck (Brian "Astro" Bradley), who constantly documents the world around him — probably not unlike E.T. director Steven Spielberg himself at a similar age with earlier film technology. Believable as best buddies, Teo Halm as Alex and Reese Hartwig as Munch give equally credible, natural performances. The teens, misfits at school, are about to be separated geographically as their suburban Nevada neighborhood is being emptied to make way for a new highway. On their final night together, the trio work to decipher a cryptic map and ride their bikes deep into the desert, documenting it all with an array of cameras. In a remote spot, the boys unearth Echo, a diminutive alien who resembles an owl with large iridescent blue eyes. Although the story is about the connection the boys make with the ultimate outsider, and how they help a creature in need, it also is about saying goodbye. Though most of the film takes place on the boys' final night together, viewers will get the sense that they'll be bonded for the rest of their lives. Earth to Echo is about adventure and bravery, but mostly it's about friendship — a subject that resonates with audiences of all ages.
