Ferguson shows a social media dividing line

Facebook CEO Alex Houq, who performed the analysis at the request of USA TODAY.

An engaged user was someone who commented on the topic, shared a link about it or liked a post with the key word.

The estimate seems to confirm what had been largely anecdotal — that a Facebook user was much less likely to read about the Ferguson protests than someone on Twitter.

Facebook releases data on how much users discuss certain events, say the World Cup, the Royal Wedding or the Olympics. But Facebook declined to comment on Ferguson.

Twitter, the reigning social network for breaking news, is expanding its arsenal of tools, which makes it easier for the public to see how often a topic is discussed.

Reverb, a new tool geared to journalists, shows that Ferguson or #Ferguson was mentioned 14.7 million times from Aug. 9 to Aug. 20.

Protesters tweeted photos of marchers, video Vines of interactions with the police, and as protests turned to looting and looting, gas, images of smoke, arrests and gas masks. Some of these were retweeted tens of thousands of times.

FACEBOOK FILTER

On Facebook, the discussion around Ferguson, Mo., appeared more muted in the days following the Aug. 9 shooting of Michael Brown. Instead, Facebook feeds appeared to be filled with friends calling on each other to donate to research on amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or ALS, commonly known as Lou Gehrig's disease, and to dump a bucket of ice water on themselves.

The explanation for the disconnect was the big difference in how the two networks surface news. A Twitter user sees what his or her followers are tweeting. While you can customize trending topics for location, it's also very easy to see what topics are hot among Twitter users worldwide — from boy band One Direction to professional soccer's Premier League to Ferguson.

Facebook is another story. It uses a ranking algorithm that filters what people see in their News Feeds. So what a person sees when he or she looks at the stream of posts and shared links is filtered based on that person's past activity, including posts liked, commented on or shared.

The idea is to make the Facebook News Feed more relevant to the user, but Facebook is often less able to respond quickly to breaking news that stretches beyond someone's previous interests and those of his or her friends.

In other words, even when Ferguson was being talked about on Facebook, many people still didn't see mention of it.

Rashed Robinson, executive director with grass-roots civil rights organization ColorOfChange.org, says he saw Ferguson all over his News Feed. But he fielded calls from white donors who were outraged they did not.

They wanted to know why, and he suggested they ask their Facebook friends.

"People like Facebook for that, because it allows them to sit inside the world they want to sit inside of, and to be comfortable. The very nature of what's happening in Ferguson is not comfortable for many people," he said in an interview with USA TODAY.

Twitter is a very different kind of social network. It's a public square where breaking news travels fast and wide. "Even if you are not necessarily interested in being a part of certain conversations, Twitter has a way of making you a part of those conversations," Robinson said.

#FERGUSON Data on what was happening on both networks in mid-August contrasts how two occurrences played out on social media.

Icebucketchallenge or #icebucketchallenge was mentioned 1.55 million times on Twitter, according to Twitter data, or about one-tenth the mentions of Ferguson or #Ferguson.

A protester of the shooting death of teenager Michael Brown checks her phone as police keep watch in Ferguson, Mo.

Twitter took great pride in its role in Ferguson, painting the hashtag on the walls of its corporate headquarters in San Francisco. Twitter co-founder Jack Dorsey, who was raised in St. Louis and whose parents live there, marched alongside protesters in Ferguson.

When asked by USA TODAY on Twitter what he thought of the protests unfolding there, Dorsey tweeted: "Heartbreaking."

Antonio French, a St. Louis alderman who provided a near-constant stream of tweets and Vines from Ferguson in the two weeks after the shooting, said social media were an outlet for people who felt they were witnessing a much different situation than the one played out on cable news

Early on, he was one of the few people recording the protests. By the second week, many more were recording on their phones. Social media connected the protesters' experience and concerns to people outside Ferguson, even around the world. When people came from outside the St. Louis area, it helped them figure out how to contribute, he said.

"I think when this story is written about, it will be hard to write about it without referring to it as #Ferguson," he said.

Twitter, he said, became the network of choice because it was faster and had a limitless reach. For years, it has been embraced by younger black people and community activists because it was so easy to use on mobile devices.

A Pew Research study found that 40% of black Internet users ages 18 to 29 use Twitter compared with 28% of whites in that age group.

BLACK TWITTER

The cultural phenomenon called "Black Twitter," which played a pivotal role in the Ferguson protests, is a growing and vibrant part of the service.

Kimberly Ellis, author of the upcoming book The Bombastic Brilliance of Black Twitter, said she saw Brown, the unarmed teenager shot by a white police officer in Ferguson, Mo., trend in her Facebook account.

"That is a reflection of my friends," said Ellis, whose Twitter handle is @d@ddness. "I hang with radical white people and black people."

But on Twitter, the walls between communities come down when news breaks. Ellis notes you can follow as many Twitter accounts as you want and you can search out news by keyword.

"There is just a greater democratization of space on Twitter," Ellis said.

And because users are confined to 140 characters, people can scan more quickly through tweets to get "a greater diversity of information," she said.

"You had to be on Twitter to really understand what was happening in Ferguson," Ellis said. "If you missed that, you missed a lot."
