CONSTRUCTION TYPES

Steel Frames

There are many key benefits to choosing a steel frame modular unit. Steel frame systems offer a superior strength-to-weight ratio for wider building options. It also utilizes a fastening system that can lower the risk of movement during high winds and earthquakes. This non-combustible construction type also resists corrosion, rust and eliminates the chance of dry rot. Steel frames will not absorb water, mold or mildew and won't swell and shrink with fluctuations in humidity. Additionally, steel frames resist against boring insects such as termites which can cause costly structural damage to buildings.

CONSTRUCTION TYPES

Wood Frames

The construction of modular wood framing takes place indoors. This is extremely beneficial because the lumber and other materials are all kept dry and safe from the outside elements. Since moisture never has a chance to become trapped inside the cavities of the structure, there is no opportunity for it to cause issues such as buckling and squeaking floors, cracking walls and ceilings, and growth of mold or mildew. Indoor construction also eliminates any delays caused by weather which significantly speeds up the entire process and can lower your overall project cost. All framing lumber is clamped onto flat, square, engineered adhesives to prevent loosening or separation. The sections are then insulated and lifted carefully into position with hydraulic cranes.
